A primary source is a key piece of evidence from history-for example: a photograph, a letter, or an object that was there at the time, or created at the event. On the other hand, a secondary source helps us to analyze primary source materials, for example: a contemporary book, or document that helps us process the primary source. The following activities and lessons will enable you to teach the difference between these to your students in a creative and engaging way. This can be a tricky concept for students to understand, so before you teach this in greater depth, introduce these key historical concepts and terms with a short video. Students can make notes and explain to you what they discover so that you can clear up any misconceptions that they may have. Learn More: GVSU Libraries Instruction Sometimes our teaching tools are right in front of us. Weekly newspaper articles are a great way to introduce primary sources to students with very little prep. Students could bring in a selection of newspapers to class each week and begin annotating them and making connections between other current publications and papers. Learn More: Ed Week- Teach with Primary Sources Photographs are a very credible primary source, and most students are familiar with modern 'photography' platforms such as Instagram, TikTok, and Snapchat. Use this to your advantage by having students begin to critically analyze social media with youth culture and current events and then link them to important events from the past. Learn More: Teach Primary This comprehensive lesson plan provides a guide on how to teach and compare primary and secondary sources using US Congress as an example.
