Metanoia counselling psychology

I am a fully qualified Integrative Psychotherapist and have completed a Doctorate in Counselling Psychology and Psychotherapy. I believe psychotherapy creates a space in which emotional difficulties can be explored and worked with in a safe, supported way. I draw from a range of traditional models of psychotherapy to inform the way that I work. I have been seeing clients for over eight years and have experience working with a wide range of issues, from bereavement and loss, to depression, anxiety, trauma, sexual problems and relationship difficulties. Fundamental change in the human personality (psychology) For other uses, see Metanoia (disambiguation). Metanoia (from the Greek μετάνοια, metanoia, "changing one's mind") has been used in psychology since at least the time of American philosopher/psychologist William James to describe a process of fundamental change in the human personality.[1] The term derives from the Ancient Greek words μετά (metá) (meaning "beyond" or "after") and νόος (noós) (meaning "perception" or "understanding" or "mind"), and takes on different meanings in different contexts. Developments William James used the term metanoia to refer to a fundamental and stable change in an individual's life-orientation.[1] Carl Gustav Jung developed the usage to indicate a spontaneous attempt of the psyche to heal itself of unbearable conflict by melting down and then being reborn in a more adaptive form – a form of self healing often associated with the mid-life crisis and psychotic breakdown, which can be viewed as a potentially productive process.[2] Jung considered that psychotic episodes in particular could be understood as an existential crisis which might be an attempt at self-reparation: in such instances metanoia could represent a shift in the balance of the personality away from the persona towards the shadow and the self.[3] Jung's concept of metanoia was an influence on R.D. Laing and his emphasis on the dissolution and replacement of everyday ego consciousness.[4] Laing's colleague, David Cooper, considered that "metanoia means change from the depths of oneself upwards into the superficialities of one's social appearance" – a process that in the second of its three stages "generates the 'signs' of depression and mourning".[5] Similarly influenced was the therapeutic community movement. Ideally, it aimed to support people whilst they broke down and went through spontaneous healing, rather than thwarting such efforts at self-repair by strengthening a person's existing character defences and thereby maintaining the underlying conflict. The Dutch psychiatrist Jan Foudraire wrote extensively about it, tracing its history through the work of Jung and Laing, and eventually considering it "a permanent change in gestalt." He cites an example where one sees a black vase, then one blinks, and instead one sees two white faces in profile opposite each other (the Rubin vase).[6] In transactional analysis, metanoia is used to describe the experience of abandoning an old scripted self or false self for a more open one: a process which may be marked by a mixture of intensity, despair, self-surrender, and an encounter with the inner void.[7] See also Backfire effect Cognitive dissonance Enantiodromia Limit-experience Metanoia (theology) Positive disintegration Twelve-step program References ^ a b Petrushka Clarkson, On Psychotherapy (1993) p. 57 ^ R. Retrieved from " Professor Simon du Plock, Head of the Faculty of Post-Qualification and Professional Doctorates at the Metanoia Institute, tells me: 'We're looking for an ambitious counselling psychologist who has the skills to work cooperatively in a small senior team with responsibility for the day-to-day management of the DCPsych. The successful applicant will additionally act as a change agent to help refresh and redesign the programme ahead of our next BPS reaccreditation in summer 2019. The Institute, based close to Ealing Common in London, has trained people in the psychological therapies for over 30 years. It presently has around 1200 students and candidates on a wide range of part-time undergraduate and postgraduate courses, in areas ranging from counselling and psychotherapy to coaching and therapeutic writing.Simon leads a Faculty that comprises four doctoral programmes – a Doctorate in Psychotherapy by Professional Studies, a Doctorate in Psychotherapy by Public Works, and, most recently, an MPhil/PhD, alongside the DCPsych.The Director of Studies (Senior Management) role reports to Simon and the postholder will join a well-established staff team. The DCPsych programme has run successfully for 12 years, and currently has 160 candidates.Simon explained the job's core: 'The incoming Director of Studies will work closely with me and with the Director of Studies (Research). The role we're now advertising will lead on teaching and day-to-day management and, crucially, the postholder will also have the opportunity to bring their ability to be innovative and their professional vision to bear.The ideal applicant will have some experience of programme management – not necessarily at doctoral level, but we want someone to whom this is not new territory.The successful candidate will also have experience as a clinician. This will inform their teaching. We also want to recruit someone who is research active and, again, this will inform both teaching and programme management decisions.The Institute has a diverse range of students and candidates. 'But it's not like a huge university – colleagues at all levels get to know each other here. And the management team is extremely accessible. If you want someone's opinion or to discuss something with them, you can easily access them.'Simon returns to his view of the calibre of person Metanoia is looking for: 'I think this is genuinely an opportunity for an ambitious person to influence the future of the DCPsych, and in the process help shape the profession of counselling psychology too. The right person really will find they can have a significant impact. And since Metanoia is growing, they will have the opportunity to join in our success.
