Si vous recherchez des simulations d'avion, voici quelques idées : * IZ Sturmovik * Falcon 4.0/FC2 * War ThunderLa revue "Avions et Bateaux" propose une sélection d'articles sur l'aéronautique historique, notamment des récits complets sur les lous de l'Atlantique, la recherche du prototype Nieuport XVII, les frères Adrien et Julien Levasseur, les débuts du transport aérien en France, Corinthe et Crête (1941) ; les planeurs allemands dans les Balkans et des articles divers tels que "Les débuts du transport aérien en France. Première partie" par Stéphane Nicolau et Christophe Cony. The sentence structures of "I'm going to check if she closed the door after leaving" and "I'm going to check whether she closed the door or not after leaving" are correct, with a slight preference for the latter, which implies two possibilities. However, when using "check that," it is generally considered incorrect as in "I'm going to check that she closed the door after leaving." Instead, one uses either "check if" or "check whether." A more informal alternative of "check that" would be "see to it" - for example, "I'll see to it that she closes the door after leaving." When checking with someone in an everyday conversation, the verb is typically "contact." Using "check in" implies a regular occurrence and prearranged meeting. There are instances where "checked in with" can be used when referring to ongoing relationships or shared projects, but this usage is different from using it as part of a contact. For example: "I checked in with the company to see if they had any promotions."
